Burns Rank High In Summer Hazards

RICHMOND - Make sure the meat you barbecue at your next cookout is not you.

Pouring kerosene or gasoline on an open fire, such as charcoal, causes one of the most common burns experienced in summer, according to Dr. William E. Gayle Jr., an assistant professor of surgery at Virginia Commonwealth University.

The three most common summer hazards which result in burns include igniting hot charcoal with combustibles, spilling gasoline on a hot lawn mower engine, or removing the cap from a car's overheated radiator. All three usually result in a person having his hands, arms and face burned, according to Dr. Gayle, who treats patients at the Medical College of Virginia Burn Center at VCU.

Burns are classified by the depth of injury to the skin. For example, a sunburn will cause only the top layer of skin to flake and peel.

Deeper, more severe scald or flame injuries produce damage to hair folicles and sweat glands. In second and third degree burns, the skin does not have the ability to grow back.

To combat the infection which rapidly sets in when deeper layers of skin are gone, physicians at the MCV Burn Center frequently rely on skin banking. They transplant donations of skin from deceased people to temporarily replace the burn victim's missing skin.

The donated skin is removed in strips four inches wide by surgeons in a sterile operating room up to 12 hours following death. Dehydrated by chemicals, the skin is rolled in a sterile container and frozen to minus 40 degrees Fahrenheit. Then it can be stored in the skin bank's freezer at 100 degrees Fahrenheit below zero.

"Homograft - - the practice of using cadaver skin - - is essential because once large amounts of skin are lost due to injury, the body has no protection against invasion by bacteria or germs. Therefore, the patient is apt to have significant infection," Dr. Gayle explained.

"Not all patients need homograft, only those with large areas of third degree burns. Patients with large areas of full thickness loss are apt to have such severe infection that even topical antibiotics, pills and shots can not totally protect them from infection. It is essential that we cover these areas with cadaver skin as soon as the burn is reasonably clean," the MCV burn specialist observed.

The process of removing the dead, burned skin and getting down to a clean area that will accept cadaver skin usually occurs within three weeks.

Patients are bathed twice a day in a large tank to remove dead skin. However, if the burned skin is not separating on its own fast enough, it is removed surgically.

Before homograft, infection often causes confusion and high spiking fevers. After homograft, the patient's fever comes down, his appetite returns, and he is oriented again. "Within 12-24 hours following homograft, the patient is completely different, feeling much better and free from pain," Dr. Gayle noted.

Within 48-72 hours following transfer, the skin usually takes and the transfer skin may look almost like the patient's own skin. However, the transfer skin is usually rejected within the following three weeks. By then, the patients's own skin is usually in good enough condition to be used for further transplanting.

The process of transplanting skin from other parts of the patient's body is continued until the patient is totally covered with his own skin. Dr. Gayle estimated that a patient covered with 40-60 percent burns could be in the hospital for months and could take up to two years for a full recovery.

The 30-year-old MCV Burn Center receives approximately 10 donations of skin a year. Donated skin of any blood type can be transferred to any other patient since all donor skin grows the same and because it does not become a permanent part of the patient.

MCV's Burn Center treats about 150 major burn cases a year.

THE REVIEWING STAND

HESTON MEETS HEMINGWAY

If you can only picture Charlton Heston with a long beard, a robe, and carrying the Ten Commandments, then there's a new record on the Caedmon label that just might change your mind.

It's an extraordinary recording of Ernest Hemingway's most loved novelette The Old Man and the Sea read by Heston without a word or a wave removed.

In 1952, when The Old Man and the Sea was first published, Life magazine devoted its entire issue to the work. Its publication brought accolades from critics the world over, and the book was specifically mentioned by the Nobel Prize commission in citing Hemingway for its coveted award.

Charlton Heston, who also recorded Melville's Moby Dick (Caedmon), has added a timeless vitality to the story of the Cuban fisherman whose idol was Joe Dimaggio. The performance runs just short of 2½ hours and is available on records and cassette tapes.

aids for the emergency medical technician training program offered through the community college. Needed equipment for rescue squads, the city Fire Department's new EMS service and the district's hospitals, plus films and material for community education and specialized vehicles.

The largest part of the grant is the institution of a regional UHF communications network which will link all rescue agencies to each other and to the hospitals.

Committees will now begin reviewing each specific item in the original grant to determine how the available money can best be spent to improve the overall quality of emergency medical services in the district.

The grant monies will come through the state bureau of EMS and are expected to become available within the next 30 days.

Dr. A. A. Fratrick of Appomattox, BREMS Council Chairman, summarized the effect of the grant award after the 24 month delay: "When we went out to raise $5,000 last spring we had nothing to offer but plans and promises. It is going to be extremely gratifying to have the means to express our appreciation to the community for its support at that critical time."

The one day session was devoted to a discussion of the budget proposed for the 1979-80 biennium by the State Board of Education. Speaking for the Virginia School Board Association, the president, Mrs. Lewis, expressed the budget as being inadequate to meet the needs of education in the state with too much responsibility placed on the various school divisions.
